Vision

A vision statement describes the future, ideal end state. Assuming the project is successful, this is how the world looks when it's complete.

When building Jira Product Discovery, our vision was "product teams focused on strategic outcomes." We wanted to build a world where the most successful companies have adopted a product model.

Mission

A mission statement describes the team's unique point of view for how the vision is going to manifest.

The Jira Product Discovery team's mission is "unleash the potential of product teams to make an impact." This is a specialization of Atlassian's mission,"unleash the potential in every team," or uplift organizations by empowering their individual teams. Jira Product Discovery's mission zeroes in on product teams, and gets specific that we'll help them focus on the impact of their work, not just output.

Goals

Goals help measure success for the entire effort. They need to be measurable and time-bound.

Jira Product Discovery's goal is to become a successful business by Atlassian standards. As a "North star metric," we chose a specific business outcome: a revenue target for a specific year. Every month, we report progress on that metric to the rest of Atlassian. Having a single goal like this helps us adapt and change our strategies based on how successful they are in achieving this goal.

Strategies

Strategies are tactical ways the team is investing time and resources, betting they will help fulfill its mission and reach its goal. Strategies work best when they are clear, crisp, pragmatic and easy to understand.

Each strategy has a corresponding sub-goal to measure its success. These sub-goals typically try to improve a specific metric, qualitative or quantitative - for example SEQ score (Single Ease Question, a measure of perceived usability), or pirate metrics (AARRR: Acquisition, Activation, Retention, Referral, Revenue). Each strategy contributes to one of those.

We always "ladder up" strategies, connecting them to desired outcomes to understand how they'll contribute to our end goal.
